Eleven patients with squamous cell carcinoma of the anal canal (SCCA) and a disease-free interval of over 5 years, as well as 44 patients with a similar disease-free interval and no evidence of bone marrow metastases, were studied. Five of the 11 patients with SCCA had bone marrow metastases identified by both serial marrow examinations and biopsy. The incidence of bone marrow metastases in SCCA was 27% in this series of patients. None of the 44 patients without bone marrow metastases had evidence of bone marrow involvement on more than one occasion. Bone marrow biopsies are a simple, safe, and inexpensive procedure. A serial bone marrow biopsy is a simple, safe, and cost-effective procedure for patients with SCCA. On March 16, 1978, a woman in northern British Columbia was sexually assaulted in a grassy park near the town of Muncho Lake. Forensic work at the crime scene focused on items that were left at the site. While waiting for DNA tests to come back, a police officer's partner started to look for potential patterns. She noticed the women's sandals were different, and realized that the perpetrator — who may have been wearing them when he attacked the victim — had different feet. The case took on a new direction: a suspect was developed, and ultimately convicted for the attack. It was the first time in Canada that someone was convicted using DNA evidence. DNA from semen found on the panties of the victim and the sandals tied
