The composition of the endocardial and vascular layers of the human fetal heart was studied in fetuses between 16 and 36 weeks of gestation (wg). The human heart was fixed in formalin and cut serially transverse and sagittally. Sections were stained with hematoxylin-eosin for light microscopy. To determine the layer-specific protein composition, the tissues were processed for immunohistochemical staining with anti-sera to the major proteins of each respective layer. The cellular composition of the endocardial and vascular layers was similar to that of the adult human heart in that there were populations of myocytes and fibroblasts. The stromal composition was composed of a small amount of collagen, elastic tissue, and smooth muscle. The endocardial layer differed from the myocardium by the absence of secretory cells and the presence of continuous myocardial-specific a-actin in the endothelial cells. In the myocardium, alpha-actinin and desmin immunoreactivity was restricted to intercalated disk networks. It was not found in the vascular layers. The vascular layer stained with antisera to all three types of vascular smooth muscle myosin, whereas myosin light chain and alpha-actinin immunoreactivity was present in both vascular layers. The myocardial and endothelial cell layers stained for the proline-rich proteins laminin and tenascin, whereas the stromal layer stained for collagen types I, II, III, and IV. This comprehensive immunohistochemical analysis of the endocardial and vascular layers of the human fetal heart has been carried out for the first time, and permits clear discrimination between the layers. Endocardial and vascular cell layers share a common stromal composition. The endocardial layer is
