Tipster is potentially a killer hole to close. If the offender had a very good reason to inform on his alleged accomplices, what does that say about his character? It would be nice to know that he's not a whistleblower who deserves encouragement and support, but rather a low-ranking creep who may have had his own dark motivations. But if he didn't do it, then how does he know? Taken together, those questions have kept many true crime fans busy over the years, and podcast hosts have left more than a few loose threads dangling. As the records for many cases have come to light, there have been holes in the known timeline, lies about who wasn't there, mysterious gaps of time, and plenty more questions. In an era when people are able to get detailed information from the archives of news, investigative news shows, and law enforcement in a matter of seconds, it's hard to make sense of the stories of the past. I spoke with Shari Linder, a crime novelist and true crime podcast host, who has become famous for pulling together a very interdisciplinary and creative take on true crime. She's widely known for her intimate interviews and in-depth research. There's also her podcast, which started in 2016 and is now thriving with a total of 50 episodes, and runs more than a dozen archived episodes. "It's just what I do," she told me. "It's my craft." I mentioned that I couldn't imagine putting myself
