language standpoint A: Firstly, I would be hesitant to learn English at all, unless you have a strong background in English literature and all of the nuances that go with it. E.g. your study of 1st, 2nd and 3rd person pronouns would better be spent on the history of those languages and the etymologies behind English words, than on various phrases or subtleties of the language itself. Secondly, although sometimes it would be of great help, even with a strong background in literature and/or language studies it is in many cases not possible or sensible to master the nuances of the English language, and without knowing the proper names, forms of the nouns, the semantic nuances and the history and geography of the language, the only way to arrive at an understanding of the language is to be able to read and understand a lot of literature, including the literature of other languages. If you can, do study history. From English to English literature to foreign literature. The better you know your mother tongue, the more other languages will open up for you. The better you know the world and its history, the better your understanding of the world will be. The
